More than a century ago, John Muir proposed that the richest ecosystem in North America is not the one we often think it is:

"Nowhere in the world can be found a combination of mountains, lakes, and forests equal to that of the Adirondack Park." His words may now be on the verge of becoming reality. In fact, the conservation community is feeling inspired and optimistic about the future of the world's largest remaining wilderness areas as they seek ways to add local communities to the mix of existing conservation areas, such as Yellowstone and Yosemite. The Buffalo National River is seen as a great alternative for the protection of natural resources. Photo by Darrell Clevenger. Today, in the heart of the National Wild and Scenic River system, the Friends of the Buffalo River is planning to take an important step toward its long-term goal of a cooperative conservation project with neighboring landowners, including a significant non-governmental organization. According to Betty

Johnson, president of the Friends of the Buffalo, they have completed negotiations with landowner groups that are sympathetic to conserving the area. The plan is for Friends to partner with the landowner groups to purchase about 50,000 acres for the Buffalo River National Wild and Scenic River System. It is the largest wilderness area in the contiguous United States, with more than half of its land protected in the federal government. And it may be easier than many realize to add to that area. While a lot of time and money has been spent in the past chasing down land in this National Wild and Scenic River area, many landowners have never had to deal with the often unwanted and potentially dangerous demands of federal land. The Friends of the Buffalo are putting together a project that will allow landowners to work with them. Their goal is to find land that is extremely valuable, but also easier to protect for wildlife. Currently, much of the land in the area of the National Wild and Scenic River is privately owned, and most of it is in very private hands. This area of land is more sparsely populated than most of the federal lands that make up the park system. "Some of it is very valuable, some of it is
