Q: access violation when trying to open a picturebox using a path from a database I'm trying to open a picture box using a path stored in a database. When I open the picture box, I get an "access violation" error. I have searched around and everyone says the problem is to do with the path that I'm trying to open the picturebox with. I have tried using the method found in this question, and it still doesn't work. The line that I'm using to open the picturebox is: `pictureBox1.Image = Bitmap.FromFile(Server.MapPath(@"~\pictureBox.jpg"))`; Any help would be greatly appreciated.

A: Server.MapPath expects a path relative to the root of the web server. You need to use @"pictureBox.jpg" which points to the root of the web server.

Animation, and Visual Effects Software: The Best Graphics, Animation, and Visual Effects Software is a powerful application designed to create Flash text effects, offering a very intuitive interface to guide users throughout the whole process. In the operation of a nuclear reactor, the primary coolant may form a body of liquid passing through ducts and other components of the reactor, and the liquid is also in contact with various components of the reactor which may become coated with radioactive fission products. Such a body of liquid is used to cool the core of the reactor, and to convert the energy released in fission into thermal energy for the production of steam to drive a turbine. In addition, the liquid of the reactor is cooled by virtue of contact with a heat exchanger for heat transfer to the secondary coolant. A problem has existed in the operation of the reactors in this manner. The primary coolant, which is, in effect, a large body of radioactive liquid, has been found to contain relatively high levels of radioactive materials and other constituents. When the primary coolant is removed from the reactor for service and maintenance purposes, a large volume of contaminated liquid is produced, and is diluted with demineralized water or fresh water to be used as primary coolant. Even after the primary coolant is removed from the reactor, there may still be some contamination, although in lesser amounts. This contaminated liquid, containing a high concentration of radioactive materials, must be disposed of in a safe manner, without the risk of contaminating the environment. Previous methods of disposing of this radioactive liquid have been carried out in several different ways. One method was to drain the primary coolant out into the environment at a non-reactor site. This solution was undesirable, for example, because the radioactive materials and other contaminants contained in the liquid were no longer contained within the reactor, and therefore, may have
